Mewu

The woman does not receive special callers. The Fantzu are equally 846 glad over the birth of a boy or a girl, because the girl can later bring an adopted son into the household. There are no festivals after a child is born; nor is there any kind of initiation ceremonies when 862 a youth reaches maturity.

Most of the work is done exclusively by the women. The men 462 pay each other visits - on horseback or on foot - and chat, the main subject of conversation being the choice of pasturelands. The young people are entrusted with the tending of the animals. The girls are also required to gather yak dung for fuel. This work is also done by the older women, but never by the men. The wives of the nomads never go out to work as do the wives of the sedentary Fantzu, because they are too busy taking care of the animals and the dairy.

The woman always has a decisive voice within the family, re- 562 gardless of whether her husband was adopted by her family or whether 593 she married into the family of her husband. In commercial deals, for example, the woman has the final decision; the man /73/ if possible asks her approval before concluding any business transaction. It can even happen that the woman beats her husband, but married couples also beat each other. Relatives cannot interfere in a marriage.
If young married couples quarrel with their parents-in-law, they move into another tent. In other cases three generations live in one tent. There can be as many as 10 inhabitants of a tent, but the average number is four - parents and two children. If a couple cannot get along, the t'ou-mu[1] gives the verdict at the divorce proceed- 586 ings.

After the death of his wife, a man can remarry immediately, 587 provided he has the necessary means; a widow can also remarry at 428 once. Orphans are taken in by the grandparents, if possible, or by the nearest relatives. If his wife dies, a man keeps his children, provided the wife has married into his family. If a man dies who was adopted into the wife's family, the children remain with her family, even though the family of a widow should adopt a second husband for her. If the widow of an adopted husband marries into another family, the children of the first marriage remain in the maternal family.

If a man dies who was adopted as a son-in-law by a family, the latter tries to find a new husband for the widow and a new son-in-law as soon as possible. He then inherits the property of the first husband, but must also take over the duties of providing for the children of the first marriage. If the woman cannot soon marry
